

Statement on Human Dignity & Shared Resources in Times of Regional Tension

March 2026

Blue Peace Middle East views the current escalation in regional tensions with profound concern. In times of uncertainty, the burden falls hardest on ordinary people, and the shared foundations of life become most exposed.

Water and wastewater treatment plants, dams, power grids, and irrigation networks are not merely infrastructure; they are daily lifelines that sustain human dignity, allowing families to function, communities to endure, and societies to remain resilient. Damage or disruption threatens access to safe water and electricity, halts food production, and cripples essential services, spreading hardship across homes and borders long after the initial event.

This hardship deepens existing deprivation. In a region where many already face unequal access to services and opportunity, further strain pushes the most vulnerable to the margins. The natural environment suffers in parallel. Our ecosystems, already stressed by climate pressures and scarcity, can tip past a point of no return when pollution or neglect occurs during periods of tension, with consequences borne by future generations.

We are especially alarmed by the risk that essential resources may be constrained or politicized. Water and energy must never become instruments of pressure or suffering; they are part of the common good that sustains life and stability. Water, energy, food, and ecosystems are inextricably linked. A shock in one area inevitably cascades into the others. In our region, where systems are already under stress, this interdependence makes cooperation not a luxury but a necessity.

Blue Peace Middle East reaffirms its commitment to dialogue and responsible management of our shared resources. Even in periods of tension, these resources must remain bridges for cooperation, not tools of division. We call on all stakeholders to protect civilian infrastructure and essential services, prevent further harm to the natural environment, and preserve every channel for dialogue. Safeguarding water, energy, and basic services is a moral duty and the cornerstone of human dignity, security, and the well-being of present and future generations.
